That the Pan-Germans are weaker, at least in real influence, than the outside world thought, is shown by the little impression made on the chancellor crisis by the clamor of their trust-bought newspapers. Their politicians, including the organizers of the new fatherland party, were not even consulted during the negotiations which made Count von Hertling chancellor. This is important at this time because it demonstrates that the people of it demonstrates that the people of Germany are really behind the peace program of this trio, and will meet Mr. Wilson's demand for a popular The first step in Count von Hertling's weeks. In the meantime it is reportweeks. In the meantime it is reported that the new chancellor has promised to aboilsh the political censorship.

This was demanded of Dr. Michaelis by the reichstag, but was never carried out. It is a difficult situation and Count von Hertling will meet heavy opposition, especially in court circles.

Socialist Support Uncertain. In the reichstag the question is how ing the various conflicting interests will test all the resources, ability and generalship of the seventy-four-year-of German democrats to make good. Zimmermann, Helfferich and Michaelis their high posts in Germany. Gen.

Ludendorf is the only democrat in high office who may be regarded as successful. Doubtless this record is the result of lack of opportunities for democracy in the past.

When Michaelis was named chancellor in July the emperor called the crown prince, Hindenburg and Ludendorf to Berlin for consultation, and the reichstag leaders did not know the result until they read about it in the newspapers. This time it was different. Field Marshal von Hindenburg was not called until after the appointment was made.

It is true that Rudolph von Valentini was intermediary with the reichstag leaders, who did not meet the kaiser personally, but that is without particular significance. Probably next time they will meet the emperor himself. It is significant, however, that in deciding upon changes in the various ministries and secretaries Count von Hertling is dealing directly with parliament and only reports results to the emperor. This step rewrites the German constitution, though it does not change the kaiser's prerogative to make the actual appointment.

Every word of Premier Kerensky's recent statement, claiming that Russia saved both England and France early in the war, can be supported by thousands of facts, declares Mr. Sack, but it would seem that some of these facts must be again called to the attention of the American people. England, he points out, is now facing practically her second real winter campaign, the United States her first, while Russia is facing her fourth.

With all her alleged "weakness," revlutionary Russia still holds half of he Teutonic forces on her various information bureau maintained in the informed by a constant series of cables from Petrograd as to the situation in

Has Caused Strength.

"The revolution, instead of causing cakness on the military alignment of the allies, has really caused positive strength," says Mr. Sack. "Had the Jermans made an advance this spring. Germans made an advance this spring, with the oid regime still in power, Petrograd would have fallen.

"There is nothing new in Kerensky's recent statements, but it contained many old truths which had to be emphasized in the most energetic manner. There were cogent reasons for his including the word money when asked as to how America could help, although Prince Lvoff omitted that item when summing up Russia's needs in April last. Lvoff did not touch on the money question first, through a natural bashfulness, the revolution being then still in its 'honeymoon,' and, second, because the American papers, many of which are now scolding Russia, were full of the news that the United States was going to help all the allies finanwas going to help all the allies finan-cially, the sum mentioned for Russia being two billion dollars."

"Out of the three billion dollars given by the United States to the allies we have received, up to date, $355,700,000. We appreciate very much this help, and here again I may quote Kerensky, who in his statement of April 23 emphasized that 'the Russian masses and the American people are today exhibiting for one another the most profound democratic sympathy in history.' But there were reasons for Kerensky's emphasizing the word 'money,' and the help already given us by the United States must be multiplied no less than five times. The allies will be victorious as soon as they present before the enemy a really united front, with united resources of men and money.

"If the allies are really fighting to make the world safe for democracy they must be most generous toward the country which, during the war, has accomplished the most splendid victory over Prussianism within her boundaries, and thus, with one stroke, made safe for democracy one-seventh of the globe. Russia will stay on her lines and will fight Prussianism further, outside her boundaries, if her enormous sacrifices for the cause of democracy are properly appreciated, and help, moral help and material help, is rushed to her by her brothers-in-arms."

Association to Raise Quarter Million Dollars for American Army

in France. The American Red Star Animal Relief is in need of a quarter of a million ollars for an outfit necessary to take the field in the spring with the American Army in France. With that need in view it appounced today that the ten days side for a campaign to raise the necessary sum. Several times this amount, it fective battle front work for American horses, but the $250,000 will enable the organization to get well started.

Must Protect the Horses. "The comparative smallness of past wars," says Dr. William O. Stillman, di-rector general of the Red Star, "and the lack of recognition by governments of humanitarian consideration for horses humanitarian consideration for horses caused heavy mortality among them to be taken as a mere incident in a campaign. If a horse were wounded he was shot or left to die, or turned adrift.

"Now all is changed. There are many factors any one of which would spell the difference between victory and defeat, and the supply of horses is not the least of these. The Red Star is taking the field to save the horse both because of what the war means to human liberty and also because it is the least humanity can do to repay part of the debt it owes those animals.

Thirty Million Dollars Saved. "The British have saved $30,000,000 by volunteer co-operation of the Red Star kind. In doing similar work we are following the suggestion of the Secretary of War. We must save the horse and conserve a supply which neither the factories of a steel trust nor the genius of an Edison can create. A million and a half have already gone. Europe is depleted and America will have to send thousands and yet thousands more. The supply has not given out, but it is getting less. Today the government is buying mares—America's breeding stock—to the extent of 15 per cent of the total requirements. Do the people understand what this portends? If they do they will line up with the Red Star and get behind the horse behind the soldier."

The Red Star is conducted under the auspices of the American Humane Association, with national headquarters at Albany, N. Y.
